Any visitor to London must have noticed the large number of beggars one comes across in the streets. These unfortunates, often crippled or blind, can be seen all over the capital. You might say they are part of the scenery. In some areas, one can see in every three or four yards, a sickly, ragged, tattered character standing at the kerb carrying a tray of matches which he is pretending to sell. Others sing some popular song in a weary voice. Others, again, make discordant sounds with any old musical instrument. They are all without exception beggars, who have lost their livelihood because of unemployment and are now reduced to seeking the charity of passers-by in a more or less open fashion. How many are there in London? No-one knows exactly, probably several thousand-perhaps ten thousand in the worst part of the year. Anyway, it is likely that among every four hundred Londoners, there is one beggar who is living at the expense of the other three hundred and ninety-nine. Among these down and outs, some have suffered industrial
